INTRODUCTION

Every year, teachers strive to help students succeed in school. Every year, the demands continue. The number of teachers is increasing, as learners become more diverse and the curriculum expected to be taught increases. In order to meet the needs of each individual student, teachers seek additional assistance from... a house. The relationship that exists between home and school is vital and can affect the student an end. Traditionally, homework has served as a communication tool to inform parents. School objectives and homework practices were widely used across all grades. Levels. It is a common ritual in education for teachers to assign homework on a daily basis. Teachers see extending learning beyond the classroom as part of their job. Teachers can provide activities that will be worthwhile and extend learning of the concepts learned in them season. However, is homework worth spending time on after school hours for students? Primary grades? Does it help build a positive relationship between home and school? we are there specific ways to educate parents to be allies in the education process?

The role of homework and what is it.

Homework is a vital part of learning and is expected of students, parents, school administration and teachers. Advantages of homework it is clear: students retain and consolidate the language taught in the classroom. Ultimately, they develop work habits because of what they learn. Their development as independent learners and their cognitive development. Language comprehension increases. Homework is an extension of the class that allows students to participate in the lesson. Learn the information presented in the lesson. builds bridges. Space between lessons to allow students to continue working on the lesson. English during the week, even if he only has two lessons week. Therefore, homework is the cornerstone of student learning process. Students who learned to pay attention and focus (Cooper &less) able to ignore irrelevant information, stimulation, and distractions, unlike that of older students, who have learned to focus and concentrate (Cooper and Valentine, 2001). Most teachers understand this and set homework conscientiously. Both students and teachers can use it to track assignments go forward. Parents can do it too. In his book "Seven Steps. Successful Homework (see References) Sidney S. Zentall and S. Goldstein. Explain the value of homework to parents: "Homework is important". Because it is at the intersection of home and school serves as "It's a window through which you can monitor your children's learning." Students themselves often do not understand this important role. That homework can play a role in their learning. Sarah North and Hannah Pillay in the ELT Journal article "Homework: A Restudy" routine', report the results of the homework survey in Malaysia English teachers. They asked teachers about their effectiveness both in terms of how they, as teachers, handle homework about homework and the success of their students. 'Results showed an interesting discrepancy in what many teachers reported satisfaction with one's academic performance, but not satisfaction with one's students productivity. The general impression was that a large number. Teachers feel they are doing the right thing but are not achieving it. The results they want.'" North and Pillay quote: Teachers' comments: "Students don't want to do their work home work. They'd rather imitate me or get likes from me." "At least Half of them are trying to finish the work they started in class, and the rest. Copy each other's work. Most students have a tendency to copy the answers because there are many other topics

Conclusion

The practice of assigning homework needs to be re-evaluated. Teachers need assessment. Whether the homework they assign is meaningful and appropriate. Teachers need to think thoughtfully. Consider its purpose before assigning homework. Some students need additional practice skills; However, if there is no one to help and monitor, time can be wasted. These students may. It is also practiced in the wrong way. Some believe that teachers need strict academic judgment. It is the right place to work, contribute new knowledge, train new study habits and do that work at school, not at home (Královic & Boyle, 2004). At school, teachers can help them need and separate tasks to challenge those students who need more. Ideally, homework can be a great way to learn outside of the classroom. When assigned the right types of homework, students can benefit academically. If teachers would by differentiating tasks, students will be able to improve their skills on an individual level. Homework should be tasks that require students to think critically in order to apply what they have learned and motivated to want to know more. Homework is still part of today's education system. It can be useful if we take it be careful when naming him. Homework has the potential to increase student understanding. Conceptual knowledge, the ability to think cognitively, and possibly student achievement if used in a the right way" (Vatterrot, 2010, p. 10). We need to evaluate the types of homework. The amount we allocate each night. We must accommodate students who need it. Today, teachers have many resources available to help them find creative activities to send home With the addition of technology, students can also collaborate on their schoolwork. Improve their learning. As Cohen (2006) explains, "basically, as educators, our goal is to promote. An educational environment suitable for learning, strong work habits, responsibility, and to promote. Successful education and social skills" (p. 5). Homework can help set these goals and to promote the love of learning among our students.
